MAGAZINE FORMAT

A magazine is a variety of different elements all compiled into one compact issue. And even if there may be different types of magazines, each with their own subjects, there is a common denominator present in many of them. Follow the simple guide below to know more!

1. Cover Page

Just how a regular book needs a book cover, a magazine needs a cover too. A magazine is usually a recurring type of media so what you choose to feature on your cover page is critical. For many magazine companies, it would normally depend on the season or flavor of the month.

2. Table of Contents

Your magazine needs to be organized. Some issues even contain more than a hundred pages. You need a table of contents not just to serve as an outline, but in order to help readers conveniently locate each story or feature within the magazine.

3. Letter from the Editor

A full page is usually dedicated for the editor-in-chief to address readers. This section contains a brief introduction to the issue or a potent message from the editorial staff.

4. Feature Stories

Every magazine needs substantial content. A typical magazine would contain subjects that are divided into sections. These sections would depend on the kind of magazine you are trying to put out. For example, a cultural variety magazine could contain a lifestyle article, upcoming events page, list of DIY tips, and a How-To article in addition to the main cover story.

5. Images

No magazine is complete without images and graphics. The key to success is a polished magazine layout. There needs to be a natural flow of images and information as soon as the reader lands on the first page.
