In the business world, even a short and simple reply to a client via email can already be an opportunity to market your brand. Indeed, you insert your official response but at the very end of that message marks your email signature to remind your recipients about your business name, contact details, and other branding elements. But you can't just overwhelm all responses with flooding self-advertisements. To make it right, try following these email signature ideas below:

1. Standard Comes First

Before you get experimental with your email signature, you should know how to make a standard signature first—especially when it is part of the basic email templates out there. Just focus on your name, contact details, and even a small icon of your profile photo for identification purposes.

2. Consider Your Signature's Relevance

A bad example is when your friend emails you about seeking shipping services yet you inserted a Gmail email signature of your attorney service. An email signature tackling shipping and logistics would have been relevant here.

3. Refer to Email Headers for Inspiration

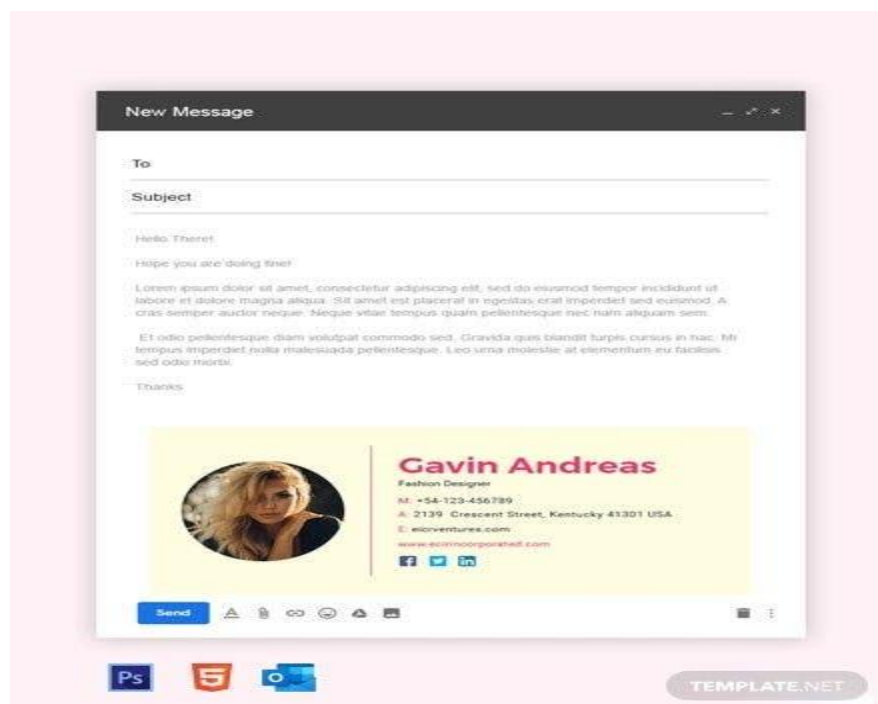

An email header is similar to an email signature, and the major difference is that headers are on top while signatures are below. So if you know a lot about headers already, then signatures should be easy for you.

4. Fashion-Forward Email Signatures

If you have seen most fashion templates, it makes sense to add some style that identifies your brand as a fashion business. So if you are a fashion designer, your email signature should represent you naturally using trends and fashion-forward elements to the design.

5. Go for Modern

When you notice that old-school email signatures have not helped your brand in any way, then embrace contemporary vibes with modern email signatures.

6. The Signature Blue Font

Maybe what your email signature needs is a popping color that stands out from your whole message in an email. An example is by using mostly blue colors for the email signature's font if the main message consisted of the black fonts.
