What's in a Brochure? Parts?

Name

Specifically, the name of the company, business, or subject that you wish to promote with your brochure. For example, if you own a pizza company named Pizza Place and you want to share that your business is having a discount, then you add the words PIZZA PLACE and DISCOUNT in colorful letters on your brochure.

Logo

Add the logo of the company/business that is behind the content of your brochure. You can add it anywhere, but it is common to place it on the top part of the brochure.

Cover

The cover is the first thing readers see when they look at your brochure. It is often as an introductory text and an image to catch a reader's attention.

Layout

The layout is the design or order of how the images and text are arranged in a brochure. This helps the reader to look through the brochure in an organized flow.

Main Text

The main text is the body of words where information is written and conveyed to the readers. Product descriptions and facts about the company are often found in the brochure's main text.

Contact Information

Details, such as email addresses, phone numbers, mailboxes, and social media accounts, are a part of the contact information. They are usually placed at the end of the content so that readers can reach out for more information.

Image

Photos and visual art are often included in brochures so readers can know exactly what is being sold to them. For example, if the brochure is about a smartphone store, images of phones will be present throughout the pages.

Graphics

Some brochures make use of graphics and visual images that show information so that readers can easily digest facts.

Brochure vs Pamphlets

Brochures are primarily used for commercial purposes to promote a product or a service.

A pamphlet is used mainly for sharing information with readers, usually for non-commercial purposes.

What's the Difference Between a Brochure, Flyer, Leaflet, or Booklets?

Brochures are usually foldable pieces of paper used for commercial purposes.

Flyers have all of their content on one piece of paper and are used to catch people's attention and quickly promote something.

A leaflet's contents consist of information about a certain topic to inform its readers about a subject.

Booklets have multiple pages bound together, allowing for more content, which are primarily used to share information with the readers.
